Native English-speakers use idioms — those funny expressions like putting the cart before the horse and sleeps with the fishes and Break a leg! — without thinking twice. But idioms often leave non-native speakers scratching their heads. Diane Nottle is the ESL coach to the international students and other non-native English speakers in CUNY's Graduate School of Journalism. Her year career in journalism included 20 years as an editor at The New York Times specializing in arts and culture.

Paulussen holds that the emergence of the Internet opens up new opportunities for publishing both in print and online (newspapers have to keep pace with the socio-cultural changes associated with the Internet): digitization and convergence require a change of newsroom culture, available resources have profoundly shaped the development of participatory journalism, and individual .
