After James Madison graduated from Princeton (then called the College of New Jersey) in , he remained for a year of graduate work to study Hebrew with President John Witherspoon. In the following decades, other promising students were permitted to stay on after receiving their bachelor's degree, but it was not until that graduate education at Princeton systematically began to take shape. The Quin Morton Graduate Teaching Award is presented to graduate students in recognition of their outstanding abilities as instructors in the Princeton Writing Program. Vigil Held for Xiyue Wang Xiyue Wang is a Princeton graduate student in History. The Princeton Graduate School was born of controversy, first between President James McCosh and his opponents, who doubted the wisdom of attaching a graduate school to a small college with a religious complexion, and then between President Woodrow Wilson and . The Graduate School was formally established in and, by history and design, it is relatively small and emphasizes Ph.D. programs in the humanities, social and natural sciences, and engineering. Doctoral education focuses on original and independent scholarship, while masters degree programs prepare candidates for careers in professional practice and public life.
